Bun and the Pixies

By Enid Blyton

Elizabeth had been having a lovely picnic with her toys, but now it was time to go home. Off they all went - Teddy, Panda and Bun, a round little toy rabbit with big furry ears.

After Elizabeth had put them back in the playroom, Teddy, Panda and Bun told the other toys all about their picnic. The little clockwork mouse listened - but it wasn't long before he started to giggle.

‘What is the matter with you, Clockwork Mouse?’ said
Teddy at last. ‘What’s so funny?’

‘It’s Bun,’ he said with one of his sudden giggles.

‘He does look funny, don’t you think?’

‘Why, what’s the matter with him?’ said Teddy, surprised. And when Clockwork Mouse told them, the toys gave a cry of astonishment - for Bun had lost his tail. It had completely disappeared! Bun screwed his head round and looked at himself.

‘Oh, dear! Oh, dearie me! Where’s my tail? I must have dropped it.’

“You really must have a tail,” said Teddy. “You look quite strange without one.”

Bun’s ears dropped flat on his head and his whiskers twitched. “Where could I have lost it?” he said sadly. “I didn’t even feel it coming loose.”

“Well, you can start by looking along the path we took to the picnic,” said Teddy. “You’ll probably find it there. Cheer up!”

There didn't seem to be anything else to do but go and look. So Bun set off by himself. Soon he came to the woodland path and looked very carefully in the grass. But there was no tail there.

A robin called to him, 'Hallo, Bun! What are you doing?'

'I'm looking for my tail,' said Bun. 'Have you seen it?'

‘No,’ said Robin. ‘But Prickles the hedgehog might know where it is. He passed this way a few minutes ago. I only hope he hasn’t eaten it.’

What a dreadful thought! Bun’s ears went flat again. He hopped quickly down the path after the hedgehog.

‘Prickles!’ he called as soon as he saw him in the distance.

‘Have you seen my tail? I’ve lost it.’

‘Very careless of you,’ said Prickles. ‘You’ll be losing your ears and your whiskers next.’

‘Don’t say that,’ said Bun. ‘I was just asking if you’d seen my tail.’

‘No,’ said Prickles. ‘I’ll look out for it. Would it be nice to eat?’

‘No, certainly not,’ said Bun. ‘It might make you ill.’

The hedgehog went off to look for something else to eat and Bun hopped down the path. But he couldn't see his tail anywhere.

Then suddenly he heard somebody singing. Who could it be?

He came to a big oak tree and peeped round it. Beyond lay a tiny dell, surrounded by tall foxgloves, and in the middle of them sat a small pixie. She was rocking a tiny pixie baby in a little cot!

How Bun stared! He had never seen a pixie before. Never!
How beautiful she was! And oh, what a tiny baby! Why, it was as small as the smallest doll in the doll's house.

Bun crept nearer. He poked his soft little nose between two tall foxglove stems and watched.

The pixie lifted the baby up and put it on her knee. Then she began to tidy the cot. First she shook out a tiny blanket made of cobwebs. Then she smoothed the cot's soft, fluffy mattress.

Bun watched. He suddenly flicked his ears up straight and glared. Yes, he glared! Then he squeaked very angrily indeed, and rushed straight over to the pixie and her baby. She looked up in alarm at the angry rabbit.

‘Oh, whatever is the matter?’ she said. ‘You gave me quite a fright.’

‘That’s my tail!’ said Bun fiercely, and he pointed with his paw at the fluffy mattress. ‘That’s my tail! And I want it back right now!’

‘Oh, dear!’ said the pixie, hushing the baby, who had started to cry in a high, tinkling voice. ‘Is it really your tail? I’m terribly sorry. I found it in the grass over there - and it’s such a soft, fluffy little thing, perfect for my baby to lie on. I couldn’t possibly guess it was a tail.’

‘Well, it is,’ said Bun, looking a little less fierce. ‘It’s mine. How do you suppose I felt without a tail? I felt dreadful.’

‘I’m so sorry!’ said the pixie, and she held Bun’s tail out to him. ‘You must take it back straight away.’

Bun held his fluffy tail between his paws. He was glad to have it back again. ‘Why, it smells of honeysuckle,’ he said in surprise.

‘Yes, I hope you don’t mind,’ said the pixie. ‘I put some special fairy perfume on it to make it nice for Baby. She had such a lovely sleep.’

The baby suddenly put out her tiny arms to Bun and caught hold of one of his ears. She pressed it against her rosy cheek, gurgling softly.

‘Hold her for a minute,’ said the pixie. ‘I want to get something.’ And to Bun’s surprise, she put the tiny pixie baby into his furry arms. She had green eyes - green as the grass - and tiny pointed ears. Bun thought she was the most beautiful little baby he had ever seen!

The pixie came back with a needle and thread and a big pink silk ribbon. 'I'm going to tie this new pink ribbon round your neck, just to say thank you for being so kind to us.'

'I'm sorry I frightened you,' said Bun. 'I was just so surprised when I saw you using my tail for a mattress. But your baby's so nice that I really don't mind a bit now.'

The pixie sewed on the tail. Bun sniffed hard. 'I do smell nice!' he said, pleased. 'Thank you very much. And oh - what a beautiful ribbon for my neck! None of the other toys has a ribbon as fine as this.'

The pixie tied it round his neck in a beautiful bow. 'There! You look a very smart rabbit indeed. I do hope you'll come back and see us again soon - and bring some of your friends with you next time.'

‘Well, I must go now. Thank you for finding my tail.’ And he scampered off, full of excitement. What a dear little baby! How nice and small and cuddly she had felt - and to think that soon he would be able to show her to the other toys! He gave an extra big skip and a jump because he felt so happy.

The toys crowded round him when he got back.

‘You’ve found your tail! Who sewed it on for you? Oh, Bun, you do smell nice!’

So Bun told them the whole story, and now the toys are longing to meet the pixie baby themselves. And whenever Bun smells his honeysuckle-scented tail, it reminds him of that tiny pixie baby in the foxglove dell. How I’d love to have seen it too - wouldn’t you?
